RADAR: Making Road Safety Women's Business

I always do my best to contribute to project activities with both professional and personal opinion. Road safety is not only expertise, but it also includes a significant portion of practical day-to-day life experience and habits, which women can often do and see differently. More female contributions at different decision-making and expert levels might help develop better and safer solutions.

Why did you choose to work in road safety sector?

Working in road safety is highly meritorious, as well as never-ending activity, which makes me feel beneficial to the society as a whole. Moreover, concrete results and benefits are often visible very quickly.

In your opinion, why is it important that more women take up road safety challenges in the near future?

There are not only more male drivers, but – statistically – they also tend to drive in a more risky and aggressive way, resulting in more accidents. Road safety needs more women, especially where it comes to the traffic safety of the most precious ones, our children.

What is your impact as a woman in projects such as RADAR?

I always do my best to contribute to project activities with both professional and personal opinion. Road safety is not only expertise, it also includes a significant portion of practical day-to-day life experience and habits, which women can often do and see differently. More female contributions at different decision-making and expert levels might help develop better and safer solutions.
